THE PASSION OF ROMAN EPICURES.

His Many Varieties of Porcine Dishes—

Preparation of a Famous Condiment.

Mr. Jefferson gives a graphic picture of the delights of a Roman cook over pork meat. "Tears of joyful anticipation rolled down his cheeks when the fat porker dropped dead at his feet; and as he wiped from the prostrate creature's lips the stains of the sweet intoxicating drink which had induced the fatal apoplexy, he smiled with tender exultation. He had reason to love the animal which afforded him materials for his delectable preparations. His varieties of porcine dishes are almost countless. The spit, the gridiron, the frying-pan, the oven, the boiler and the stew-pan were all employed by turns in preparing the flesh, which was the passion of Roman epicures, and to which the culinary professors could impart no less than eighty different flavors.

The Apician cook was never prouder of himself and his profession than when he sniffed the fragrant exhalations of a small baked pig, which had been stuffed with a compound of thrushes, beccaficos, minced "pluck," dates, onions, snails, mallows, beats, leeks, celery, cabbage, coriander seeds, pepper, pinenuts and garum. His hands trembled with fine emotion as he made a deep incision down the porker's back and poured into it a hot mixture of pepper, rue, garum, sweet wine, honey and oil, thickened with frumentum.

The preparation above mentioned under the name of "garum" appears to have been the condiment in greatest demand. No banquet was approved unless garum dominated the flavor of most of the dishes. It was used in soups and stews, in ragouts and sausages, in forcemeats and salsmagrands of fishes. Improving most materials, and agreeing with all, it was poured liberally on flesh, fish, game and fowl and hundreds of messes, each of which contained from a dozen to fifty ingredients.

And now, at the risk of destroying somebody's appetite for his single square meal of the week, on the Sabbath day, a description of the method of preparing this famous Roman condiment, without which no meal was a square one in the sense of being satisfactory.

"This exquisite condiment," says our high authority, "was obtained from the intestines, gills and blood of fishes, great and small, stirred together with salt, and exposed in an open vat to the sun until the compound was putrid. Nothing is known as to the proportions of the several piscine ingredients; but while small fishes were thrown whole into the vessel, the large fishes—such as tunny, sturgeon and mackerel—contributed nothing to the mess save their gills, internal parts and juices. When putrefaction had done its work wine and spice herbs were added to the liquid-cent garbage. Finally the liquor of this toothsome compound was strained and sent from Greece to the Roman market."

If there is anything in modern cookery that nearly approaches the infamous compound above described as the indispensable adjunct of the square meal of the ancient Romans, certainly it is not described in any of the thousand and one cook books, the attempt to follow which has brought discomfort and disappointment to so many an otherwise sensible American housewife.

Practical Treatment of Hydrophobia.

[Paris Cor. London Times.]

I asked M. Pasteur whether a patient once treated would be exposed to hydrophobia if he had the ill-luck to be bitten again. He replied that the virus acted very slowly, and that consequently, by the inoculation of the attenuated virus in the dose of three-quarters of a cubic centimetre, a patient was made not susceptible of the malady. The virus of the bite localized itself completely during the time when the rest of the body had been rendered refractory. Now, whatever be the part where the virus is deposited by the bite, if the inoculation lasts as he has shown by experiment, a year and a half, the virus deposited by the bite will have digested, and will no longer exist in the body of the patient who has been cured. It can no longer produce any effect, as it has ceased to exist.

In the case of Pupille, after the lapse of six days, the virus through the wounds had not yet left the hands, which had been bitten. Consequently the virus had not yet penetrated into any of the regions where its presence causes an outbreak of rabies—that is to say, into any of the parts connected with the nervous system corresponding to the cerebral region. It will remain cooped up, but after some months it will be digested and expelled. The virus has not, therefore, a retrospective effect, but its progress is arrested by the treatment, and it is digested, while the patient remains not susceptible.

The treatment thus neutralizes the malady by localizing the virus, which M. Pasteur has never found in the flesh, blood or muscles, but exclusively in the nerves and the glands connected with them.

False Teeth in a Crematory Retort.

[Crematory Expert.]

You can't destroy a false set of teeth in the retort of a crematory. This I deem one victory of art over nature. Our own teeth we can reduce to ashes with the rest of the body, but false teeth and gold plate hold their own. Silver plates or any other substance used by dentists will disappear, but 4,000 degrees of heat have been turned on artificial teeth without destroying them, and the gold rivets in the teeth, after that heat has been applied, will also be found intact.

Suggestive Lines.

On the bill of fare of a western hotel is regularly printed these suggestive lines: "In Rome gluttony became so excessive that it was repressed by law. Bear this in mind!"

New Orleans Picayune: Habit! That's the thing, after all. To get in the habit of craving excitement, novelty, luxury—that is the road to ennui, if to nothing worse.

There are now 1,140 candidates for seats in the British house of commons, of whom 626 are Liberals and Radicals and 514 are Conservatives.

Philadelphia Times: More men are wanted everywhere with the far-reaching power to mind their own business.
